The biggest challenge in biomedical and medical research today is translating or translating back from animal models to humans. Medical research has become much more complicated with the challenges created by the presence of more than 2200 cellular and biomolecular species which interact at the biochemical level. As medical researchers seek to develop means to control or treat the diseases of the 21st century with few or no side effects, the need for better models to help us understand the sequence of molecular events that lead to development of disease is more important than ever. The current tools for modeling the in vitro behavior of human cells are limited. Cell culture is extremely cumbersome and time-consuming. A new generation of in vitro systems has the potential to be much more powerful in predicting the behavior of human cells under normal and pathologic conditions. The development of new methods that would allow the study of systems of cells at the cellular and molecular level has been given a new impetus by a very interesting and potentially important study that we have recently performed. We have developed and proposed a novel approach to study the cellular and molecular interactions that occur in a single in vitro system. An engineered micro-electrode array has been developed that provides a unique tool for gathering information about the responses of cells cultured on the chip. The unique spatial structure and location of the micro-electrode array provides a unique capability of extracting information from single cells. Moreover, cells in contact with the electrodes can be observed directly under a microscope with high quality video capability. While we are primarily interested in studying the behavior of endothelial cells with respect to thrombosis, we can make use of this technology to study any cells that are already in culture or migrate into culture from an endothelial layer Getting the message about moral behaviour right. Recent work that examines messages about moral behaviour from a social psychology perspective emphasises the role of descriptive norms (descriptive message effectiveness) and the impact of attitudinal responding (belief and value change). In particular, meta-analyses show high overall correlations between descriptive norms and attitudes about moral behaviour and a positive relationship between this kind of message
