Posts Tagged 'groundbreaking children's book' Rabbi Jill Hammer is the new Director of the National Museum of American History. She also wrote the book Embracing the Memory of Our Bodies: At the Borders of Science, Health, and Politics, first published by Cambridge University Press in 2008. Below is an excerpt from the book's introduction: This book considers what it means to move beyond the "borders" of existing definitions of health and disease, as well as notions of intelligence, to include the bodies of children with disabilities. Although the historical instances examined span more than four centuries, ranging from the turn-of-the-last-century United States to today, the first chapter focuses on the development of public health policy in urban, industrial, nineteenth-century Britain to diagnose the failures of civil society to provide reasonable conditions for children. The second chapter looks at how medicine has encompassed issues of health and disease within a larger theological framework, underscoring the "unproportionate" status of children and women compared with their respective place within the adult world. Medical and scientific understanding of disability is explored in the third chapter, highlighting both the powerful influence and important caveats of positivist discourse on "birth
